

Federal financial management consulting

Increasingly, federal agencies are faced with the challenges of implementing streamlined financial business processes, standardized reporting practices and improved data transparency.

The transformation challenge

The most recent Association of Government Accountants (AGA) Chief Financial Officers Survey has reaffirmed that federal financial management executives and managers continue to face many challenges with financial systems technology, human capital management and budget uncertainty. The President's Management Agenda (PMA) contributes to these challenges as it urges agencies to continue modernizing IT, to increase access to data to provide transparency and to evolve the civil service workforce skills and work locations to meet the changing federal environment. Many of these challenges are interconnected and are best solved by developing a long-term strategic vision. Within this vision, agencies should define specific goals and objectives, which will inform the subsequent detailed strategic plan that guides resource allocation and key activities over the time horizon of the strategic vision. Federal financial management executives are in a unique position to make lasting changes by leveraging existing and new technology while also tapping into the available enterprise data to solve these problems.
